

the 1990s, the number of people in the world who are employed in the service sector has increased from 1.2 billion to 2.2 billion, and the number of people in the manufacturing sector has increased from 1.2 billion to 1.5 billion.

As a result of these changes, the world economy has become more service-oriented, and the service sector has become the dominant sector in most developed countries.

The service sector has also become a major source of employment in developing countries, and is expected to continue to grow rapidly in the future.

The growth of the service sector has led to a number of changes in the way that services are provided, and has led to the emergence of new service industries.

One of the most important changes has been the increasing use of information technology in the service sector, which has led to the emergence of new service industries such as e-commerce and e-learning.

Another important change has been the increasing use of outsourcing in the service sector, which has led to the emergence of new service industries such as call centres and business process outsourcing.

The growth of the service sector has also led to a number of challenges, such as the need for new skills and training, and the need for new regulations to protect consumers.

Despite these challenges, the service sector is expected to continue to grow rapidly in the future, and to become an even more important part of the world economy.

The growth of the service sector has also led to a number of opportunities, such as the creation of new jobs and the development of new products and services.
